In total, the hospital is receiving $6.9 million to make improvements at the entire spectrum of its facilities, from the emergency department to the surgical intensive care units. "It is such a pleasure to have these grants in a year where our community has endured incredible tragedy," said Joan Denney, president and CEO of the hospital. 'Every trauma (patient) has a great story' "There are so many families with a loved one who have been seriously injured. In our acute care unit, we see the impact of trauma on a daily basis, and we have very real patients who inspire us to improve our delivery of care to injured children. "By combining the talents of our outstanding doctors, nurses, staff and healing arts professionals, we hope to improve the quality of their lives, and our community's." The funds are being directed to design and implement a new neonatal intensive care unit, which will be located within the same complex as the acute care unit. Denney said the new neonatal unit will more closely resemble a normal delivery room than a traditional NICU. While many families have a child that has suffered serious injury in an accident, some families have a child who was born with multiple birth defects, and have undergone multiple surgeries. In addition to one of the two new NICU rooms, the new facilities will have a designated space for parents who choose to have their newborn children discharged to a level of care, or other treatment, other 6a5afdab4c
