Regional disk availability may vary. ^ MacBook 2018: Information under "External Components" is quoted from Parts & Accessories->Portable Computers. I am not 100% certain, but the Unibody MacBook Pro (2015) and later has the S-video port moved to the display area of the computer. You would plug the TV into a separate S-video port. There is a workaround, although it involves a very small extra piece. Here is the workaround as described on MacRumors, which may or may not be applicable to the model you have. A: As frowine says in his answer, it's not going to be possible to use a S-video connector on this laptop. However, as I first heard about this possibility, you can hook up the back of an iPhone 4 to the LCD of a MacBook, using the older analog audio/video connections. Unfortunately I have no experience doing that, and I don't think Apple will necessarily be accepting iClones from any 3rd party. So it would be something of a last resort.
