Q: Is there a way to choose the position of a vertex in a wave animation? I'd like to be able to make a material which makes a surface look like a sinusoid at the right frequency and amplitude. (The goal is of course for the animation to look like a real object being made out of waves, but I'd like it to be animated without the user having to make a single vertex). For an example, I would like to look like this at a given distance from the viewer: I want it to be animated more or less smoothly like this (with the notch, at a fixed distance and at various distances): Is this possible? Note: I've tried using some code to get a texture, texturecoordinate and sinusoid shader, but I'm forced to double buffer. I was thinking that the correct approach would be to render a vertex to a texture and simply have that texture as a uniform variable in the vertexshader. Or maybe there are other ways? A: It is possible with the Wave Shader of FX Composer. In your case, create a new Wind 1 vertex Shader with First and Last vertexes as the negative Half Sinewaves of a sine wave, which are Vector2 values. Then use that as an input to a Wave Shader to animate Wind on the Surface. for the Texture input for the Sine Wave, use a Unwrap on the current UV in Node > Math > Sinewave: Property Amount: 0.25 Towards: 3 Bounces: 0.3 if you have to animate the spectrum too, make sure you use a rough-quad and you rotate the Output position when animating. Optionally, you can also animate the Final Texture Coordinate to see the

System Requirements For Elden Ring:

After installation, use the Skyrim Launcher to start the game Must be on 1.9.2+ Q. What is CLOCKWORK INNOCENT? Clockwork Innocent is a mod by the one and only (TheReal)MerkkaRohde that completely revamps the vanilla female characters in Skyrim. The mod tries to make those characters more realistic in terms of proportions and facial features, but also to remove the 2D cut-off effect that you get with default Skyrim portraits. NOTE: New TES5Edit meshes are
