In October 2015, I decided to start learning about Photoshop. I used the 24-day Photoshop CC course from Udemy. After taking the course, I worked with Photoshop for two days and three days, respectively, to figure out what I wanted to do with the program. I now have good knowledge about everything in Photoshop, and I did not have to use my brain too much to create the layouts I was supposed to create. I found that I was able to produce satisfactory results by letting my instincts and intuition guide me through abstract layouts. Then I realized that I was constantly changing my tools. I would often spend several days or even weeks importing and cleaning a number of screenshots. I did not want to do all this manually. This is where Scriptor Pro, an AI app, came into the picture. Beyond the tools I already knew from Illustrator (all I have to do is make a font selection and press Start), Photoshop's tools are highly intuitive. For example, I can choose which of my layers I want to reposition. Adobe eliminated all the trouble for me by creating many fine tools that let me do this easily. Of course, I was able to master this program step-by-step, but I had to intersperse many programs and use these three together. Of course, this may be the most difficult part of the whole process: the frustrations of mixing and matching them inconsistently and correctly was my most headache-inducing problem. The problem was so much of a headache that I thought I might be doing it all wrong.

The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web.

Unfortunately, the browser support isn't as complete as we'd like. We currently support Photoshop in Chrome, and we are working on Windows, Mac, Android, Linux, and iOS versions. We'd love to have support for all other major browsers, but we know that the web is a very challenging platform to run complicated and resource intensive software. Our goal is that the web offers an excellent experience in the browser for the vast majority of our users. We're excited to see if that's the case. 933d7f57e6
