Adobe Photoshop is hard to beat for sheer power. You can use Photoshop to create some of the most impressive visual effects and designs thanks to the large array of tools and plug-ins and the breadth of the featureset. It doesn't hurt that it's the most capable photography application available. But it does have its flaws, which I touch on in this roundup. As Adobe has developed it over the years, we've seen almost constant feature enhancements come to it. In 2013, the most prominent change was the release of the spot healing tool, the radial filter, and the Liquify tool. It's an interesting change to note that they haven't managed to release an update that took away the Liquify tool even though it has been available throughout its lifetime. It adds tremendous flexibility to the toolset, so much of my praise of Lightroom goes toward its lack of that versatility. In 2014, highlights included the addition of vector masks, intelligent cropping, and improved RAM management. Never before have we seen the process of a digital format as complex and nuanced as the digital negative. Every photograph that's digitized starts with the original negative and requires considerable work to make the fit to an appropriate format. The choice of lens and shutter speed, to name a few, are a handful of variables that affect how the exposure is set up. It gets more complicated when you start considering that the original negative is not square. It also reveals itself when you take a look at the "negative" itself. We can buy them at high street stores or maybe even sell them ourselves. I mean, who doesn't want to make some money while also taking some inspiration from photographs? But selling them remains a question mark. Why people would want to sell an image they took is a mystery. If the photograph is really worth anything, it should be shared. Something like ThunderDOG is a great supporting, and a VSCF helps offering a fair price. And from another point of view, there is nothing wrong with keeping the image for a second, and a third, and a further time. Do they need to be sold? What can be really deserves one, and things that wouldn't help anybody deserve a different fate.
