you have any problem resetting your password, we recommend you to send an email at support@mailinator.com. Is it just me, or is this the first time we've seen a "Have-a-been Ex" played for laughs on TV? It's a very cute scene, but I don't think it's any different from scenes we've seen in sitcoms or movies before. For instance, in my opinion, there's a very large difference between "It's hard to be popular. and only 14-year-olds have friends" and "I can't get a girlfriend, but here's a self-help book that might help you out".... The only thing that separates this from previous jokes is the fact that it's a "played for laughs" moment. Most of the time, we laugh at things because we know they're not actually true, but we don't laugh when someone says, "It's hard to be popular, and only 14-year-olds have friends." It's a fact that's almost impossible to believe, even though we know it's just a joke. We don't laugh because we know it's a joke. We laugh because we recognize that someone is exaggerating the truth for the sake of a joke. At any rate, it's not a big deal. It's just one of those things that you can laugh at. You know, as usual, there are exceptions to all of this. I just don't think this is a particularly special one. In general, I think it's funny when people are funny or cute or stupid, but when we start to come up with excuses for them being that way, it usually falls flat. Someone who's cute, for example, is just cute. There's no need to explain it away. Someone who's stupid is just stupid. There's no need to explain it away. Someone who's funny is just funny. There's no need to explain it away. Someone who's tragic is just tragic. There's no need to explain it away. So why are we explaining away the inevitable? It's not fun to make an exception for every single personality trait, is it? We should just acknowledge that it's
